How we act and what we say affects other people's moods and how they feel about us. This is why it is important we think about what we say and also, how we say it. We need to think about whether or not what we say could hurt someone's feelings or make them feel upset.

When Adam fell off his scooter, his friend Ryan said something to him that made Adam feel upset. Why did Adam feel upset?

What should Ryan have said to Adam instead?

If your friend was learning how to do something and was not very good at it, what are three things you could say to let them know that you encourage and support them?
(Keep in mind – you must have a big heart and social mind).

It's important to be honest, have a big heart, a social mind, and consider what you would want a friend to say and do if the situations were reversed. We want our friends to know we are interested in what they have to say and what they are doing. We also want to be supportive when our friends are happy, sad, mad, or need help.

How would you feel in each scenario? Draw a picture in each square that shows how you would feel.
